

US-China Symposium
"Resource Recovery & Environmental Management"
 at the Ronald Reagan International Trade Center Washington DC
Friday, May 6, 2005

Background

Severe environmental pollution and depletion of natural resources now dramatically curtails China's capacity for economic and social development. China's transition to a resource efficient, recovery and recycling based economy is critical to world's future, however China still lacks an enabling policy framework, market mechanisms and technology development for its adoption. The U.S. experience in resource recovery and recycling in last thirty years can be very useful for Chinese policy makers and professionals. Meanwhile, advanced technologies have vast potential for introduced to China via market mechanisms due to the increasing prosperity in China. This conference provides an opportunity for experts and entrepreneurs from US and China to exchange experience on policy and technological issues and discuss new business.

During the meeting you and your company will have the opportunity to meet with members of the Chinese Delegation responsible for procurement of equipment and services for resource recovery and environmental management
